Organic & Regenerative: Driving the Future of Food, Beauty, and Textiles

Organic and regenerative agriculture is no longer limited to food production, but is increasingly shaping the future of beauty, textiles, and other non-food value chains. When integrated with organic principles, regenerative approaches offer a systemic response to climate change, biodiversity loss, and the sustainability challenges of global supply chains.

Companies and value chains adopting organic and regenerative models are now called to demonstrate their positive contribution to ecosystems, raw material quality, and territorial resilience, moving beyond mere compliance toward the recognition of tangible environmental outcomes.

This seminar will bring together farmers, brands, certification bodies, and international organizations to explore how organic and regenerative agriculture can drive the future of food, beauty, and textiles. Through value-chain perspectives and company case studies, the discussion will highlight how these models can build truly sustainable, resilient, and ecosystem-positive supply chains
